Introverts love their silent time alone because it's the only time they could truly feel like themselves. But there's a worth wild feeling of neglecting those pleasures in exchange for spending time with someone who makes you feel special and wanted.

How to Know if an Introvert is in Love With You

A weekend full of activities is what dopamine-loving extroverts crave, but for introverts, it can be too much. Our internal resources get depleted, and we feel the need to retreat alone to a quiet space to recharge. Sometimes we'll want to be completely alone, while other times, we may enjoy having you join us in quiet solidarity. 10.

12 Things to Know About Being in a Relationship With an ...

An introvert is a lot less likely than an extrovert to fuss if you're being quiet or if you need some time inside your own head, with your computer, video games, books, or whatever you like to lose yourself in. Introverts don't keep a running commentary going about life (except in their heads, but you don't have to listen to that) and understand that you can feel close and connected with another person even in silence.
